COVER: Two climbers planning a mountain expedition route

[SUMMIT] I've been reviewing the northeast route up to the summit—looks like a solid approach if we start before dawn.

[RIDGE] Good call. The weather window is tight, so we'll need to move like ghosts through that initial stretch.

[SUMMIT] Exactly. The early morning mist can be tricky—sometimes you feel like you're climbing through something that isn't even there.

[RIDGE] True. I've had that experience before, where the fog gets so thick it's almost like moving through a phantasm, completely disorienting.

[SUMMIT] That's the word for it—like chasing something invisible, almost spectral in nature.

[RIDGE] Right, we should pack extra headlamps then. Can't navigate what we can't see, phantom conditions like that demand preparation.

[SUMMIT] Absolutely—and I'm thinking we should mark our route with those reflective markers, the ones that glow even when visibility drops to nothing.

[RIDGE] Smart. When conditions turn ghostly like that, we need every advantage. I'll bring the high-vis tape too.

[SUMMIT] Perfect. And let's discuss the descent plan—I've heard stories of climbers who've vanished on that face, like they were never really there.

[RIDGE] Yeah, those tales are unsettling. People disappearing into thin air, becoming literal phantoms of the mountain. We need solid anchor points all the way down.

[SUMMIT] Agreed. I want us tethered at every stage—no room for anyone to become a ghost story on this expedition.

[RIDGE] Understood. I'll double-check all our safety gear. Can't have us turning into some apparition that haunts these slopes.
